BEACH TREASURE HUNT

For the intrepid beachcomber, dead sand dollars, shells, starfish, driftwood and varied smooth stones are not all you'll find. You may also find live critters.

"spoils" from a walk on the beach. There are brown, green, white and pale blue sea glass, sand dollars, small rocks, a shell, driftwood and a good-sized piece of white, sea ceramic.

To the right is a live sand dollar. You can tell it's alive because instead of the pale gray or white of a dead sand dollar as seen above, it is a dark gray. Also, on a live sand dollar there are tiny, velvety, hair-like spines that move against your hand. If these are present, place them back in the ocean. The same is true of any live creature. Place them back in the ocean; they are not easy to keep alive outside of their natural environment.

Besides dune grass, which you should never disturb, the most prevalent plant/flower at the ocean is the sea rose or as its also called, the beach rose. The

There's nothing quite so therapeutic as taking a walk on the beach. If walking along the beach listening to the waves crash, while smelling the salty ocean air is not enough for you, then the seven miles of beaches are filled with all sorts of treasures, if you know what you're looking for. To the left are the sea rose was originally from "away", but easily took hold in New England due to its ability to withstand salt spray.
